

WILLIAM BROWN DEAD.

Well-known Ball Player Succumbs to Lingering Consumption.

William Brown, known to all lovers of baseball in the United States and these islands, died recently at his home in San Francisco from consumption, after a lingering illness. He was here about eighteen months ago in health and made many friends.

Brown first attracted public attention as a baseball player in the early days of the old California League. He then played with the Greenhood & Morans of Oakland, catching the delivery of George Van Haltren, who at that time had just started his career as a professional ball player, an occupation in which he soon became famous and one that he still follows with great success.

Brown's work with the Oakland team secured for him an engagement with the New York club of the National League, and for years "Baby Bill" was one of the giants of "The Giants." He followed the fortunes of most of the ball players of the country when the Players League was formed, and after the collapse of that organization Brown resumed his place behind the bat for the New Yorks.

Brown was one of the most able and conscientious players of his day, and with the great ball-loving patrons of New York and other National League cities always held in high esteem. He was one of the best of the many splendid catchers on the New York team and could fill acceptably other places in the field, especially first base.

Brown retired from the game some years ago, and since then had been living with his mother at her home, 138 Silver street, in this city. He was always in receipt of a good salary and saved his money without acquiring the reputation among his fellow players of being miserly.

About two years ago, Brown, who was once a perfect specimen of physical manhood, became afflicted with lung trouble. He sought relief in the Hawaiian Islands, Southern California and Arizona, but in vain. Deceased was thirty-two years of age.
